Not illustrated. 1833 Excerpt: ...to run, still keeping his hold on the chaise elbow and continuing his laughing dialogue with the ladies, which, from the rattling of the wheels was necessarily carried on in a raised tone of voice. The clear fresh air of the heath heightened the complexions of Hannah and Huntley, each of whom thought they had never seen the other look so handsome; and the race continued till a slope in the downs carried them out of sight of Rosiua and Mr. Russell. Hannah looked back after them once or twice, and asked her mother if they had not better wait. "That is easier said than done, Hannah," replied Mrs. Wellford, smiling, as she vainly pulled the rein, "Our magnanimous donkey seems to have snuffled inspiration from the breezy air." "Is this your best driving, madam?" asked Huntley, gaily, " I thought you had been a better whip. Ah, give him the rein; you are hurting your gloves more than his mouth. This unwonted speed will soon abate, depend upon it; and we may as well await our distanced companions at the foot of the next hill as any where else.". Acting on this resolution, they half traversed Heeley common. Rosina, in the mean while, had been rather annoyed at being left behind with Mr. Russell. "He had joined them," she said to herself, " without being wanted by any body, and now had completely broken up the party." "Had not we better walk faster?" said she. gently dragging him forward as she spoke: "they will be out of sight presently." But no: Mr. Russell hung heavy on hand. "We cannot keep up with them," said he composedly, " and I dare say they will wait for us at the bottom of the slope." "Oh, don't trust to that," cried Rosina eagerly, "for I kn...
